MR. DON CLOKE: One thing I failed to mention earlier as I spoke is the -- in regards to terrorism, and the Native American tribes of this country are really concerned about terrorism of high-level nuclear waste passing through and around and near their reservations and their cities, and I would like to point out that there's a current article in today's Las Vegas Review-Journal on page 9A from the CIA director, Mr. Tennant in regards to international terrorism, that it's getting worse by the day, believe me.

I would also like to state that during the Gulf War -- we're all familiar with the Gulf War. There were Native American Indian people fighting in this war, as well. Some of them are relatives of mine.

They had -- the United States used a particular weapon. That's -- what it is, it's depleted uranium projectile which can penetrate nine inches of carbon steel, and when it goes inside, it explodes, and it's really scary for me to think that we're going down the highway with these big heavy casks of high-level nuclear waste when you've got some sniper up on a hillside somewhere with one of these weapons and ammunition of the depleted uranium bullets firing into one of these casks.

It could create a very devastating and deadly situation, something I just wanted to mention food for thought.

Thank you very much.
